

Legal Culture and Identity in Central and Eastern Europe

Legal culture has in recent years become the fulcrum of research for socio-legally minded scholars. From theoretical attempts to conceptualise and categorise legal cultures, to empirical research efforts to measure it, legal culture has generated a lively discourse. At the same time, this heightened interest brought with it a multiplicity of debates which warrant further discussion.

This is especially so in Central and Eastern Europe: fraught with historical, geological, sociological, and political ties that make this region an excellent case study of legal cultures. The countries in the region share deep historical ties, both through the empires of old with their Austrian and German influence on the legal systems, as well as the shared experience of a socialist past. In addition, since the regime changes of 1989, the countries in the region have all been influenced by the emerging body of EU law and the vision of a Ius Commune Europaeum.

What we also share is the experience of life on the periphery. One might think of this as a curse, being chained to a hegemonic discourse by means of symbolic violence. This is apparent in the experience of the legal family of 'Socialist law', the problematic residues of which remain ever present in our legal systems. But one might also look at it as a blessing. For this experience of both belonging and distance gave rise to such influential theoretical contributions as Eugen Ehrlich's living law, fuelled by the experience of the reception of imperial law. Some have also argued that this experience of periphery is key to understanding and conceptualising a Central European Legal Family.

Thus, there is much that ties the countries of Central and Eastern Europe together. At the same time, we are seeing a resurgence of the concepts of national legal and constitutional identities. These are increasingly used as argumentative tools for emphasising national characteristics and interests in the face of an ever-closer integration. What exactly one might mean by constitutional identity and what are its characteristics remain largely underdeveloped. Consequently, scholarly discourse from multiple countries in the region might be illuminating not only on what we mean by constitutional identity, but also what might the constitutional identities of different countries entail, as well as how they might influence each other.

The topic of the 2022 Forum thus invites scholars to think about what binds Central and Eastern European legal systems together, and what divides them. How does the experience of periphery influence our legal systems and legal theory? How should we characterise our legal cultures? What implications does this have on comparative analysis? What do we make of the increasingly popular notion of national constitutional identity?

We welcome contributions that engage these topics from a complex socio-legal perspective:

Theories of legal culture in Central and Eastern Europe

Characteristics of Central and Eastern European legal cultures

Experiences of periphery and its impact on social theory

Central and Eastern Legal Family: myth or reality

Experiences of Empire and Socialist law in Central and Eastern Europe

Central and Eastern European constitutional identities

We also welcome papers sharing a similar methodological focus on related topics for an open panel.
